The TLS is a 35mm, manual focus, slr with a vertical travel focal plane shutter, a match needle TTL exposure system and an auto diaphragm aperture on the lens. This makes it in many ways a standard spec camera for the period it was made – very similar to the Pentax Spotmatic for example – but it is a bit different in design.

Ricoh singlex TLS strip down and repair – removing the top of the frame advance Removing the top cover on the TLS was relatively straight forward, the only tricky piece being the cap on the top of the film advance lever. This is screwed on but needs something with a lot of friction to get a grip on it and remove it.

The TLS design is the screw-mount update to the camera that was the Nikkorex F, Ricoh Singlex (Nikon F-mount) and Sears SLII. The design was then licensed to Cosina who modified it slightly to create the highly underrated Cosina Hi-Lite. See the Argus/Cosina STL 1000 page for how this fits into camera history.
